Sheals the river the check,

The the smiles of life around us, There's a chain upon the heart, Whose clankless fetters would us,

'Mid the lighted halls of pleasure, Peans wild and high

Like fond music's dying measure, Ye may hear that heart lone sigh. We may list it at the altar, Where have met the plighted twain, For one wounded heart may felter, Mong the happy bridal train.

When all else is still and lonely, And the calm of thought is by. Ye may mark that stillness, only Broken by one gentle sigh.

Tis a sigh that tells of sorrow. Thro' the darkness of the day.

with details of two more subchill steam. boat dirasters will be found in our columns today. Not less than 200 lives, embracing most valuable citizens, have been sacrificed in one week by these two catastrophes. The late awful destruction of life on board the Mozelle, it seems, has had but little effect in producing caution and prudence, with others. We have, since that occurrence, almost daily met with accounts of similar accidents. though none so terrible in their effects, until the two we now record. We almost despair of any thing putting a stop to these disasters. Legal enactments will never ensure safety, if prived of both skin and hair. the fears of the confectors of the Boats, for their own lives, will not produce a reform.
