In order that you may better under stand the character of the conflict, which I shall presently attempt to describe, and appreciate the indomitable courses and resolution of our little army, as displayed. in the 'storming of Monterey,' it is proper that you should first learn the position of the parties at issue.

Monterey contains about 15 000 inhabitants, and is situated at the base of a lofty range of rugged mountains, called the Sierra Madra. A branch of the San Juan river divides the city in unequal parts-the larger and better portion being between the river and the base of the mountain. A gently ascending slope, covered in places with chapperal-with here and there a field of corn or sugar gane. spreads itself before the town. The road by which our army approached, descends over this plain into the centre of the city. Standing upon the elevated ground, midway between our camp and town, but little of the latter can be seen. It is embowered in trees-s spire of white wall being, in some places, all that is visible through their branches. In front of the city, and about one fourth of a mile out, upon the plain. of Monterey, its topography defences and for- covering 3 or 4 acres of ground. Dunc n's Battery having accompanied Worth's division, our three remaining Batteries of Field pieces (Bragg's, Ridgely's and Webster's) took up position to engage the Mexican forts upon the south of the town.

The battle commenced with a brisk canconading on both sides, in which the onemy had much the advantage-our guns not being large enough to be effective in battering; their men were also concealed behind stone walls, whilst ours were within range of their smallest pieces. The Mexicans excel in the exercise of artiflery and indeed the battle was fought on their side, mainly with that strong arm of war. For about one hour, our division remained in line, anxiously watching a scene so novel to volunteers, their hearts beating with wild enthusiasm, as they beheld the great superiority of the Mexican Artillery.
