POETRY.

HOOPS VS. QUATERS.

Talk not so loud, we're hoope
Do of our chins, nor what we lope,
We'll ever just what we please,
For every body now hath need
Protection from the wavy breed,
If she regards her nose.

Was ever earth more crushed with trash
Than you who grow the vile monstrosity,
And, with a spring hand,
Deal out to us in ev'ry rhythme
That woe's the hoop! It's all a crime!
But this we understand.

There's some who look quite felice,
While others look somwhat cance,
And some seem both combined;
Just as we seem to have the taste
Of what we eat, so is it better here.
If they but had a mind.

Then, too, in this progressive age,
A hoope is not to be despise,
Which makes a quater very gay,
Like every other wavy jape,
But those just let me ask.

What's that?—a hoope about your head,
Or a quater about your chin?
I know where the place is,
Where such a spot can fairly be,
About your quoter face.

And if you have it in your nose,
And filled with wife tobacco juice,
All ready for a squit
Upon some lady's fancy dress,
Or in the face of liveliness—

What don't fall on your shirt?
To smoke, and chew and raze a crop
Of fat end wad and set the top,
With time and money spent,
Just kill your cup of usefulness,
While, to be true, you are fitfulness.

A walking measurement,
And as you walk the streets about,
Like come great awkward, lousy lost,
With a long nose to puff;

You think yourself most wondrous wise,
And like the tool quite large in size—
But hold, I've said enough.

THE WOODBINE THAT FOLLOWS THE STRING.

BY REV. RICHARD C. FORRESTER.

Do you see how these tendrils take hold of the string,
As though by instinct of love?

From the first to the last, the string,

And here the sweet floweret above?

As though by a law which it never break,

The woodbine is led by its guide,

The upward direction it hastens to take.

In all the rich glow of its pride,

Do you see how these tendrils stand over the wall,
Far up the old whences they spring?

The lily that tries on that woodbine to call,

Would have to force it to its bone,

And yet that proud height, whence its odors come

Likes a nosegay might bring.

Down, was reached by degrees from the ground,

By the way of its governing string.

Do you see how these tendrils stand over the wall,
Far up the old whences they spring?

The lily that tries on that woodbine to call,

Would have to force it to its bone,

And yet that proud height, whence its odors come

Likes a nosegay might bring.

Down, was reached by degrees from the ground,

By the way of its governing string.

Do you see how these tendrils stand over the wall,
Far up the old whences they spring?

The lily that tries on that woodbine to call,

Would have to force it to its bone,

And yet that proud height, whence its odors come
